BOOKS IN PROGRESS

Criminal Governance, Policing and Citizenship in Latin America

I am currently working on a book manuscript that explores the problems of lawlessness, criminal rule and police violence. The book draws from my work in both Mexico and Brazil as well as secondary research from El Salvador, Venezuela, Guatemala, and Colombia. It argues that criminal groups establish forms of informal local governance, at times confronting and at other times associating or even colluding with law enforcement and the state. These forms of criminal governance also vary according to whether criminal groups establish forms of local authority that are more “benign, collaborating with the communities where they operate and providing social order, versus forms of rule that are highly predatory, either by extracting rents from the community or by ruling with unrestrained violence. These forms of informal criminal governance are prevalent at the sub-national level in many developing world settings. The book further explores the variety of strategies states have followed to “confront” organized criminal groups, and the implications of these security policies for the dynamics of violence, police behavior and human rights abuses. Lastly, I explore the concept of citizenship in these settings and how the poor are often deprived of basic rights through problems such as the disappeared, femicides, clandestine graves, and torture.

WORK IN PROGRESS

”Can Non-Immigrant Guest Worker Programs Help Escape Violence and Poverty Traps? A Multiyear Project using a Randomized Control Trial Evaluation in the U.S. and Mexico” (with Alice Wang). Over the course of the next five years, we will be able to study approximately 20,000 temporary workers who will be granted visas to work in the U.S. Of those, we estimate that, conservatively, between two and three thousand will be newcomers for whom we will be able to randomize the allocation of their first visa. We plan to carry out this intervention by recruiting workers from poor, marginalized communities. Some of these communities are located within the most violent areas in Mexico where the state has been captured by criminal groups it is comparable to an intervention in insurgent-controlled territory during a civil war. We hope to use this project to set up a longitudinal study that can follow subjects across generations and serve as a resource for researchers from diverse disciplines. We plan to track outcomes concerning health, human capital, social mobility, and entrepreneurship as well as the durability of these outcomes.

”Police Violence, Organizational Networks and the Killer State in Rio de Janeiro” (with Vanessa Melo). Despite renewed attention, police violence what causes it, when it is legitimate or illegitimate and how best to control it are not well understood. Part of the problem is lack of data on the conditions in which killings by the police take place. The paper uses thousands of records on ammunition consumption by individual police officers, a large N-survey collected among the Military Police of Rio de Janeiro (N=5,300) with a series of embedded experiments, and data on police trajectories to explore how police behavior is shaped by unit commanders and in-group socialization by which norms and values are internalized. The paper documents the drivers of police vigilantism in Rio de Janeiro.

”State-criminal alliances and community predation: Evidence from Rio de Janeiro militias” (with Edgar Franco and Stephanie Gimenez). This paper studies the collaboration between militia groups and the state in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. We document the evolution of these groups from local protection rackets during the 1980s and 1990s to a parallel armed wing of the federal state under the Bolsonaro administration. The main argument of this paper is that when the state has a low capacity to provide basic security and public goods, there is an incentive to create an alliance with private enforcers. However, as this relation becomes more symbiotic and convoluted, these actors emerge as a predatory form of local governance. Ultimately, the integration between militias and the state harms the communities they control. As militias diversify their portfolio, they become operationally indistinguishable from drug trafficking organizations with an important qualitative characteristic: they are endorsed by the authorities. This paper empirically tests the evolution of the militias and their harmful impact on communities with a novel dataset of criminal governance based on more than 500,000 anonymous citizen reports.

”Strengthening Life Skills for Youth in Places of Violence” (with Stephanie Gimenez and Veriene Melo)
 This paper presents an evaluation of a pedagogical tool, Agencia de Redes para la Juventude, a platform that promotes collective inquiry, reflection, and experimentation among youth in the favelas of Rio de Janeiro. The paper reveals the potential of this innovative pedagogical tool as an alternative to more conventional vocational training programs. We exploit an unanticipated budget shortage to select a control group among youth who were selected for participation but eventually were excluded. Through propensity score matching and a difference-in-difference design using panel data, we show that the program had powerful effects in helping young favela residents create social and business innovations, and it also increased income and formal employment in substantial ways.

”Torture in Criminal Prosecution: Authoritarianism, Democratization and Criminal Justice Reform in Mexico”. In this paper I explore the role of Mexico’s transition to democracy in the use of torture in criminal prosecution. I use innovative data streams to explore torture, a behavior that is extremely hard to measure: 1) a survey of the Mexican prison population (N= 58,000); 2) survey experiments collected among 6,000 police officers in three cities: CDMX, Monterrey and Tijuana; and 3) three large N community surveys with embedded experiments.
